archTIS is currently beta-testing its Kojensi secure content collaboration and information sharing platform with the Australian Attorney General's Department.

The addition of the Axiomatics technology, both as a stand-alone product and as integrated into Kojensi, will enable archTIS to accelerate its expansion into the financial services market prior to the launch of the Kojensi and DataKloak cloud products.

archTIS managing director Daniel Lai told the Proactive Investors Stocktube video channel the strategic partnership and reseller agreement with Axiomatics would allow the companies to build their reputations in the attribute-based access control space.

Lai said: "It builds network reputations, expands the market for us, it provides complementary technology for archTIS to expand into new data sets and new applications

"We offer them access to the government space and they offer us access to the financial sector, so it's a complementary strategic relationship.

"Most importantly, (the deal) allows archTIS to get into the commercial sector much faster."

Under the terms of its agreement with Axiomatics, archTIS will expand and complement its product offering to include Axiomatics' ABAC solution which secures alternative data sets and applications.

archTIS' existing secure microservices model, which underpins its core Kojensi technology, will also be enhanced by Axiomatics' application authorisation and policy building capabilities, enabling Kojensi to secure alternative data sets and applications.

archTIS' MD Lai said: "Working together with Axiomatics and leveraging their global expertise in applying authorisation policies at the database and application layer of solutions, will create a powerful technology for controlling and sharing sensitive data.

"This is highly desirable for corporates in the financial services sector and therefore accelerates our ability to push into this market, ahead of the launch of our Kojensi and DataKloak cloud products.

"This agreement opens up numerous opportunities for both companies to jointly explore new markets and apply our combined expertise."
