

Shear stress testing to allow optimal 'dry stack tailings' design and improved water recovery.

The San Jose plant and site layout coupled with civil engineering and logistical work has been modified from the original scoping study.

Further work on the dry stack tailings and water recycling has shown improvements in the volume and surface area of total land allocated to the storage of tailings from beneficiation and roast leach material.

These improvements could potentially result in smaller surface area of disturbance and recapture of water contained in tails for processing, reducing the already low annual water balance for the integrated industrial project at San Jose.
