

ever.

"They have good infrastructure by and large," says Read.

"It's stable, and generally they've managed their path pretty well." What's more, it's prospective.

"One of the project types we are looking at is the classic iron-oxide copper-gold formation," adds Read.

"But there are a lot of different project types in Zambia, which just need the right exploration approach to determine economic viability as feasible development projects."

To kick things off, Buffalo is likely to be the subject of a limited drilling campaign next year.

But watch out for wider developments: Bezant is also on the lookout for more prospective deals, although Read at the moment is slightly reticent about what form these might take.

"We're still finalising our strategy," he says.

The transition phase is now well advanced, but it isn't quite over yet, it seems.
