Australian Potash new video shows evolution of Lake Wells paleochannel

Australian Potash Ltd (ASX:APC) has released an animated video displaying the evolution of the Lake Wells paleochannel from a Miocene lake (23-5.3 million years ago) through to a 3D rendering of the proposed Lake Wells Sulphate of Potash Project processing plant and harvest ponds.

The project is about 500 kilometres from Kalgoorlie in the north-eastern goldfields of WA and is one of the world's premium locations for solar evaporation sulphate of potash operations.

With a forecast 30-year mine life underpinned by a 3.6 million tonne reserve and an 18.1 million tonne measured resource estimate, Australian Potash aims to produce 150,000 tonnes per annum of premium grade sulphate of potash once the project is fully operational.
